ALLEGED ROBBER

A little further questioning of Walter Dailey, the would-be accomplice in the Roy robbery of March 25, by Special Officer Joseph Jones of the Oregon Short Line and Sheriff T. A. De-Vine, caused Dailey to break down and acknowledge that he has been decelving the officers.

He now says that all he knows of the robbery and saw two men whom he thought were the bandits. Dailey after going over the ground near Roy yesterday, was brought back to Ogden

The only excuse the young man offers for the fake story, Sheriff DeVine says, is that he was in distress at Laramle and he thought that if he could disclose something that would lead to a disclosure regarding the robbery at Roy, he would gain favor with the officials and they would help him. Sheriff DeVine says he will hold the young fellow in jall for further orders from government officials. The

For one and one-half hours last night at the Tabernacle, a cultured audience had the rare pleasure of being associated with one of the choic est characters of modern drama, made alive by the artistry of Arthur Kachel, dramatic reader of Boston. The character was that of Herr Von Barwig, central figure of the drama "The Mu Eagles' Special Notice sic Master," immortalized by David Warfield. Without scenery or make-Oh Wednesday evening, April 12, up, but with the finesse of a master reader and student of character types, there will be a special election to fill Mr. Kachel not only made his characterization of Von Barwig as nearly perfect, without makeup, as the most critical could wish it, but his impersonation of the other characters was ilmost equally strong.

The Bostonian was introduced by T. Earl Pardoe of the Weber acedemy faculty, and with a finely drawn word picture he took the audience into the theater at Leipsic, the city where Von Barwig has found his greatest happiness and wherein also enters the tragedy that the playwright, Charles Klein used as the base for the development of a character of soul. The character of Von Barwig is a combination of the true musical temperament and unyielding, unselfish love, a type that can live through sorrow and appreciate joy. All of these emotions were made to pulsate last night by Mr. Kachel in his reading of the role and. being entirely human, their appeal reached the audience with manifest force. Applause was withheld until the close of each act, lest the spell of the scene be broken, and at these points the reader was heartly reward-

Mr. Kachel possesses a voice of great power and flexibility, admirably controlled, a command of platform poise that at once wins his audience and a fine knowledge of the value of dramatic situations. The only criticism of his work last night was a slight un-naturalness in his impersonation of Costello and Stanton.
